

An Awá family near Jurití post.

Military Police removing obstacles set by woodcutters to prevent access to the logging areas.

Recently cut timber inside the Awá reservation. 11 main logging places have been detected along the road used by woodcutters to extract timber.

One of the tractors used by woodcutters to open roads in the tropical forest.

Three pick-ups captured by the police. They were all released, with their drivers, that same night.

The rivers have been cut in several places, altering the ecosystem and leaving the Awá without fish – a precious food resource.

A river completely blocked by the construction of a road. This explains the difficulties met by the Awá in trying to find water.

The wing of a harpy eagle (Harpiya harpiya) and two stools made with hard wood in a campsite.

One of the illegal campsites discovered deep inside the Awá reservation.

An illegal ranch, occupying thousand of hectares, that affects both the Awá reservation and the Gurupi Biological Reserve.